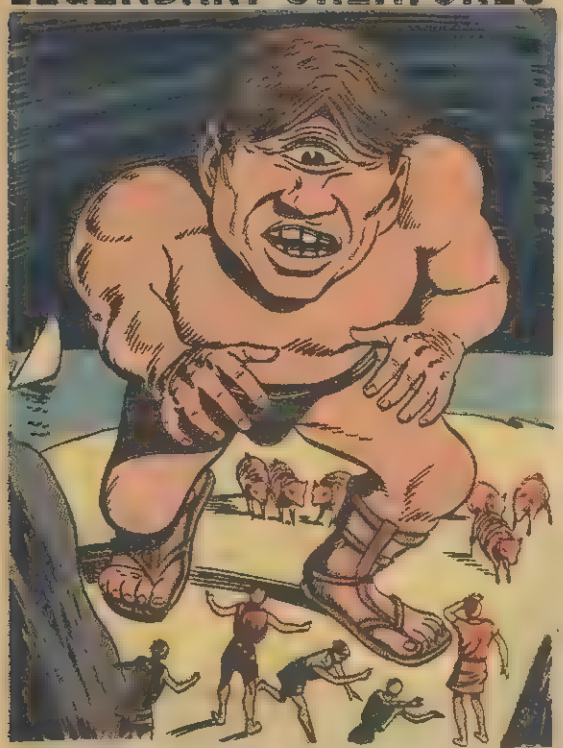
MONSTER BUILDING

LEGENDARY CREATURES



© 1964, WESTERN PUBLISHING COMPANY, INC.

Mythology is filled with misshapen monsters and wicked semi-human beings.

Beautiful maidens called Vily, who sang and danced, were feared in Croatia and Bulgaria because they could assume the forms of wolves, snakes, falcons or swans. These animals are especially to be feared when attacking, hence the Vily were "predatory monsters" after changing form.

Scylla was once a lovely maid whose misfortune was to have Glaucus, a merman, fall in love with her. Scylla did not return his love, so Glaucus asked the enchantress Circe to cast a spell upon her. However, jealous Circe poisoned the waters of the bay off the coast of Sicily where Scylla bathed. The lovely girl became a monster with waving tentacles doomed never to move.

Part-animal and part-man combinations were common in legendary creatures. The Minotaur had the forepart of a man and the hindpart of a bull. Minos, the King of Crete, confined the monster in a labyrinth and used him as an instrument of revenge against the Greeks.

When Minos' only son was killed while visiting the Greek king, the King of Crete conquered Greece in rage. He, thereafter, exacted a tribute of seven maidens and seven youths every nine years, to be fed to the Minotaur. Once these young people were led into the labyrinth, they could never get out.

The Gorgons were monstrous women with huge pig-like teeth, brazen claws and snaky hair. Other tales say they were dragonlike with wings. Whichever form they took they created terror, for those who looked directly at them were turned instantly to stone.

The swamp-dwelling Hydra had nine heads, any of which, when cut off, was succeeded by two others.

Other frightful creatures were the Geryon, which had three bodies, and the Centaurs, who were half-man and half-horse combinations. The three-headed, dragon-tailed dog Cerberus was also greatly feared. He guarded the gate to Tartarus and permitted entrance, but none could depart.

The Unicorn is described by the Romans as a ferocious beast similar to a horse but with a deer head bearing a single black horn three or four feet long. It also had the feet of an elephant, the tail of a boar, and bellowed in a bull voice. It was said that a Unicorn could not be taken alive.

Giant monsters fill worldwide folklore tales. The Cyclops trapped Odysseus and his companions in a cave. In addition to his terrifying stature equal to ten men, his one round eye in the center of his forehead (Cyclops means wheel-eyed) struck fear into human hearts.

The mighty giant Anteus forced strangers to wrestle with him to the death. Always victorious, Anteus added the skull of his victim to the roof of a temple. Each time Anteus touched the earth after a wrestling fall, he sprang up with renewed strength.

These are some of the fearsome creatures in mythology. However, there were also great heroes who performed many marvelous deeds. They were courageous and dauntless and finally defeated the monsters.
